Tuesday, September 16 • 3pm

Rita Anne Rollins Room (8th Floor), Rollins School of Public Health

Scholars, journalists and non-governmental organizations all trade in the currency of knowledge. Technology is creating new and rapidly proliferating opportunities for sharing information, including online publications, blogs and op-eds, as well as new opportunities for collaboration. While opportunities for public scholarship have never been greater, models of collaboration are less clear. How can scholars, journalists and NGOs connect in meaningful ways? What are the lines between and amongst advocacy, reporting, and scholarship? Such issues come into particularly sharp focus with the challenges of reporting on conflict and violence situations. These questions become even more complex and urgent in the evolving space of online journalism.

Participants

Lauren Wolfe  Award-winning journalist and Director of the Women’s Media Center’s Women Under Siege project

Pamela Scully  Emory University Professor of Women’s, Gender, and Sexuality Studies and African Studies

Sabrina Karim  Emory University PhD Candidate in Political Science

Bill Lichtenstein  Award-winning journalist and President, Lichtenstein Creative Media and Advisory Board Member, The Rosalynn Carter Fellowships for Mental Health Journalism

Kindly RSVP to idn@emory.edu or 404.727.6951.